The main reason is that in Linux, the file descriptors are set by the main application process using file descriptor numbers. Thus, you could not use descriptor 2 to communicate with other applications. The solution of using the file descriptor is to create a new child process and using file descriptor numbers. The following is the source code. `if (fork() == 0) { /* re-initiate process / //... execv("/usr/bin/nethogs -i 0", argv); exit(0); } else { / child process / //... dup2(fd[0], 0); // Standard input (0) -> file descriptor 2 dup2(fd[1], 1); // Standard output (1) -> file descriptor 2 dup2(fd[2], 2); // Standard error (2) -> file descriptor 2 close(fd[0]); // Close standard input (0) close(fd[1]); // Close standard output (1) close(fd[2]); // Close standard error (2) execv("/usr/bin/nethogs", argv); exit(0); }` I want to use the file descriptor 0,1,2 and 3 in Linux. Please refer to the explanation above. Linux file descriptors are set by the main application process using file descriptor numbers. As for your system, you may use the file descriptor to communicate with other applications. The following is the source code. `if (fork() == 0) { / re-initiate process */ //... dup2(fd[0], 0); // Standard input (0) -> file descriptor 2 dup2(fd[1], 1); // Standard output (1) -> file descriptor 2 dup2(fd[2], 2); // Standard error (2) -> file descriptor 4bc0debe42`
